MARINE CORPS RESERVE CENTENNIAL

Early Years

As U.S. involvement in World War I appeared likely, increased manpower requirements necessitated a Reserve Force to augment the Regulars (Active Duty). On August 29th, 1916, President Woodrow Wilson signed the Naval Appropriations Act into law, creating the Marine Corps Reserve, which added more than 7,000 Marines to the fight.

Reserve Marines seamlessly integrated into ground and aviation units, fighting side-by-side with the Regular Marines during decisive battles such as Belleau Wood, Soissons, St. Michel, and Meusse-Argonne.

Early Years

Captain Allen M. Sumner was the first officer to join the Marine Corps Reserve on March 22nd, 1917.

Reserve Marine's collective contributions helped turn the tide of World War I, validating the utility of maintaining a Marine Corps Reserve to quickly augment and support expeditionary units deploying anywhere around the globe.

Patriotism motivated U.S. women, as well as the men, to join the fight. Beginning in August of 1918, women began to join the Marine Corps Reserve. Over 300 women were selectively screened and joined to the Reserve. Women Marines proved their worth by successfully fulfilling critical war-time duties.

The Pacific island-hopping campaign of World War II required a surge of Reserve Marines into the Regular forces. Newly-developed amphibious warfare doctrine required massive assaults on fortified Japanese positions. To meet these significant manpower requirements, the Marine Corps expanded to a record 485,000 personnel.

Crucial manpower support came from the 19,168 African American men who joined the Marines during the war. Trained at Montford Point, near Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, they served as enlisted men since 1942 and as officers since 1945. Approximately 8,000 African-American Marines performed their duties under fire at places like Saipan, Tinian, and Iwo Jima. Some of the Montford Point Marines would continue to serve honorably in the Reserve Force through the Korean War and beyond.
